Strategic Fuel Storage & Bulk Liquids Potential

Recently the Australian Government Department of Industry, Science, Energy and Resources, requested submissions for contributions in forming a strategic fuel storage policy for Australia. Given the significant nature of this contributor to Australia's energy consumption, a secure and reliable source and supply of fuel is critical.

In addition, the Australian and United States Governments have also announced plans for a US funded, commercially operated, strategic fuel reserve in Darwin.

The Land Development Corporation has submitted a number of sites suitable for the storage of fuel in the Northern Territory, including two sites within the Bulk Liquids Area of the Darwin Business Park, currently home to Vopak which is Northern Australia's largest petroleum import and distribution terminal.

Currently zoned Development (DV), the two sites identified comprise one lot of approximately 8.8 hectares with expansion options, taking the potential lot size to 14.7 hectares, and a second lot of variable available size also available.

Both sites have close proximity to the nearby pipe rack connecting to the Bulk Liquid Berth of Darwin Port, capable of receiving vessels of Panamax size. Additionally, the first of the two sites offers rail frontage, providing flexibility to future proponents on transport and export connections.
